Love and a Ribbon

Mr. Jerome Sandberg was a kind and sympathetic boss. He could have retired five years ago and let his grandson, William Sandberg, run the business. But he preferred to be active.

"So I am seventy eight," he would remark. "I hope to be right here at my desk when I am eighty eight. Work is good for the human race. Just try to do nothing. The hardest thing in the world is to do nothing. The easiest thing is to do the kind of work that stimulates you."

Just now he was reading and rereading a letter that had been typed by the young lady sitting next to his desk. He placed the letter on his desk and smiled.

"In a lifetime I have had many secretaries. They come and they go. Some married the men right here. Others went on to better and bigger things in the business world. You look like an intelligent young lady. So you are not perfect when your fingers hit the keys of the typewriter. This I can overlook. But there is not the slightest excuse for doing a sloppy job of erasing the mistakes and retyping the words correctly. Just think of the impression such a letter would make upon the mind of the business man who gets it. So take the letter back to your office and retype it. Do a good job. I know this is your first week here."

Ethel Lawton managed to mutter a low "Thank you" and then left the office of her boss. She walked across the hall and sat down before her typewriter. She inserted a sheet into the roller and began to retype the letter. Suddenly she stopped. She was conscious that a nice young man was peeping over her shoulders. So she stopped typing and turned around. She recognized young William Sandberg.

"So my grandpop still wants his letters to be perfect. You look sad. Can I take you out to lunch? Please say yes. It will make me happy. You refused me yesterday and the day before. I will keep on asking you until you change your mind. The Sandbergs are a very persistent people."

The young man left her and she continued her work. At noon he reappeared in her office and they both left for lunch. He took her to a small place off the avenue. They sat in a booth and she still looked sad.

"Worrying about that letter?" he teased. "Forget it. Millions of words have been typed and erased. No problem at all."

"No problem at all," pointed out Ethel, "If the result comes out neat. I have an idea. You should have a special typing ribbon. With a semi-permanent ink. Then if you make a mistake it ought to be easy to erase. Use some kind of chemical eraser if necessary."

"That's not a bad idea," complimented the young man. "I took my major in Chemistry when I went to college. Have a friend who makes typewriter ribbons. So I will call him up this afternoon. Bet we could make a fortune with it. But I have money so why bother. You can make that fortune. Will you see me tonight? I have two tickets for the opera Aida. Lucia Borneste is singing the leading role."

Ethel agreed to go and told him he could call for her at about seven thirty that evening. Then she returned to the office and worked until five o'clock. The bus on the corner took her to her home. Her mother had supper waiting and she ate quickly.

"The boss' grandson is calling for me tonight," she told her mother. "We are going to see Aida."

At the appointed hour the young man arrived and was introduced to Ethel's mother. Then the two left for the opera. William bought a libretto and soon they were figuring out the English translation of the Italian. They enjoyed the opera though Ethel shed a few tears at the sad ending.

"Why couldn't the heroine have married the man of her heart. Then the two live happily after?", she wanted to know.

"We can't ask the heroine nor even the famous man who wrote the opera," said William. "You have a point there. But do we want our stories and operas to be like real life? Or is it the other way around?"

They returned home and William wanted to kiss Ethel. But she resisted and pushed him away.

"Why?" he protested. "I love you. Simple as that."

"Isn't as simple as that," she replied a bit sadly. "You hardly even know me. In life we can't erase the mistakes we make as simply as we can on a sheet of typing paper. Even then we do leave marks and blotches. Please, I don't want it to be that way."

"Oh, well, then I'm sorry," half apologized the young man. "Not for wanting to kiss you. But if in any way I have hurt your feelings. So, please, let's forget it. How about a hike in the country this Saturday afternoon?"

"Only if I can make the lunch," added Ethel. The keeper of the clouds had enough sense to see that his rainmakers were in another part of the state on Saturday. The sun shone in all his glory. They drove out to the country and parked the car. Then took a hike of about a mile.

"Quits for me," pleaded William. "I must be out of shape. That's what you get for making the automobile the way of life. Grandpop used to tell me he walked five miles to work and back every day when he was fourteen. Maybe the horse cars were too slow in those days."

Ethel laughed. William had a small over-shoulder bag in which the lunch had been packed. They rested on the ground and ate. Suddenly they became aware of an unexpected visitor. A little deer walked right up to them.

"I wish I knew what you feed a deer," said Ethel. "But here goes a slice of bread."

Without any trace of fear, the little deer took the slice of bread from Ethel's hand and ate it. Then the animal turned around and soon was out of sight. Ethel watched the direction in which the animal had gone.

"What a wonderful world it would be if we could all live in peace with our fellowmen and even the animal creatures could exist without fear," she said.

"A female philosopher," teased William. "You want a story book world of happiness. Perhaps it is a good goal. You still must be thinking of Aida. But let me tell you about the ribbon idea. I contacted my friend and made some suggestions. Within two days he had his first rough ribbon ready. Some kinks have to be ironed out. It ought to be a good money maker."

They walked back to the car, hand in hand. When they reached the car a little squirrel was jumping over the hood. He seemed to be enjoying himself very much.

"Sorry, little fellow," said William. "But we have to go home. Must take the fair princess back before the magic hour of twelve strikes. Surely, you know about those things."

The squirrel stood up on his two hind legs, wagged his tail as though in complete agreement, and then headed away for the nearest tree. Ethel and William drove home and somehow the angle of her head shifted to the left and it rested on William's shoulder. He brought her home and remained for supper. When he left he held her hand and just said one sentence.

"Maybe Life can be like the story book."

She didn't see him for the next five days. Then she was called by the buzzer into the main office. Instead of Mr. Jerome Sandberg being behind the desk, it was his grandson who spoke.

"Take this letter young lady. Just dictation only," he said.

Out came her shorthand notebook and the sharpened pencil began taking the words that came from the mouth of the young man.

"First we have the contract from the ribbon company. I do advise you to sign it. You get a royalty for each ribbon that is sold. It is a fair and good contract which they are offering to you. But there is another contract which I want to discuss.

This is a life contract. Wherein both parties to it agree to love, honor and obey until death do them part. They will share all the happiness or sorrow that may come their way. For each other they will have the fullest measure of love, sympathy and understanding. Want this contract with me as a partner?"

Mr. Jerome Sandberg opened the door to his office only slightly. He peeped inside and then closed the door with a sigh and a smile.

"I knew I couldn't keep her in this office," he told himself. "Wonder what to get them as a wedding present?"
